Are you a young leader, activist, mediator, or facilitator working for change in NYC? Are you concerned about issues in your school and community, like conflict and violence, sex and relationships, and drugs and alcohol? Do you want to meet other young people who have similar concerns?

On Saturday, May 15th, join youth from throughout NYC at the 2010 Network for Peace Youth Dialogue Conference: Youth Talking About Peace and Change. The conference will bring together 100 young people to explore how you can use dialogue in your work.

Get involved in workshops presented by youth from schools and organizations including EARS (Effective Alternative in Reconciliation Services) in the Bronx, the Osborne Association and Global Kids in Brooklyn, and Mott Hall High School in Manhattan. Talk with other youth about the issues that are important to you, including violence, police misconduct and racial profiling, and making the transition to college.

Come with your experience, your ideas, and your passion for creating change. Be prepared to share what you've done or what you'd like to do. Build your connections, build your dialogue skills, and build peace.

Space is limited, so register today to come to the conference. We look forward to seeing you on May 15th!
